

Dubin: We can do whatever you wish, and for as long as you wish. And I promise to learn something about Humen Tan. I just can't quite remember.

Blum: Was he Japanese?

Dubin: I don't know. I mean, from his name, it seems that he was Asian; but I know no more than that. He might've even been Filipino. I'll tell you who probably would know and I'll call him. Peter is today a partner in the firm of Mann Gin Dubin and Frazier. And Dick Mann and Jackson Gin and Leo Frazier and the late Walter Ebel were all junior partners in my firm. I am sure that Dick will know about Humen Tan. And I will be glad to call him.

Blum: Well, we'll rely on you for that information.

Dubin: Yes. All right. Now we're back to—what?

Blum: You've said your career was inextricably tied with that of your brother's, Martin David.

Dubin: Yes. Yes, indeed.

Blum: As I learned a little bit about him, he is on the Board of Arbitrators [Panel of American Arbitrators Association]. Would you talk about that?

Dubin: Well, he was at one point, president of the Chicago AIA chapter. He devoted an enormous amount of effort to the AIA. He's a fellow of the AIA, he and John Moutoussamy. And they must have decided that was enough in one firm.

Blum: Well, was he on the panel of American Arbitrators Association?

Dubin: Yes, he still does that occasionally. He's very good at that.

Blum: What is the function of this board?
